The visit which Judge Parker received this morning from a large delegation of Hungarians, is looked upon as significant. There are 50,000 Hungarian voters in this city, and they always vote together. The delegation which called on Judge Parker to.day assured him that he would receive almost the solid support of the Hungarians of New York.

Democrats are naturally jubilant at the coromous crowd, which was at the reception at the Manhattan Club last night to meet Judge Parker. There were twice as many people present as were of the candidate several delegations were of the candidate several delegations were ernment is a government by party. is absolutely true when construed to mean It is also true in a general way mentalities of parties certain govern-mental measures are inaugurated and certain principles made the guides of gov-ernmental action. Thus considered, party membership and the existence of party organizations are not only legitimate, but seem to be actually necessary to the organizations are not only legitimate, but seem to be actually necessary to the openition of the machinery of our government. With this view of partisanship in mind it has always appeared to me that a young man is engaged in serious business when in the first stages of mature citizenship he is considering his future politiaci affiliation and making choice of the party to which he will attach himself. I cannot escape the feeling that the final determination of these matters by a new voter makes a sort of modified relinquishment of his freedom of judgment, and his subsequent subjugation to influences which tillute independent action. The assumption of party relationship will necessarily color his view of political subjects and give to his consideration of public affairs a leading which it will be hard entirely to shake off. These conditions are due in part to the unescapable influence of party comradeship, and perhaps more to the blinding zeal that grows out of party effort and contest. To these must be added the pride, so much a part of human nature that it must be reckoned with and so nearly related to high maniliness that it can hardly be condemned, which, except in the severest stress of conscience, refuses to appear disjoyal to party enlistment.

In the place of apprehension and uncertainty it promises peace and restful confidence, instead of conquest and undertainty it promises peace and restful conplications, it bromises watchful care of the people's welfare at their homes and in the affairs of their daily life. As against the deliavic on a preverting dazle and gilter of a foreign expansion, which allures the unthinking which it undermines the strength of our national intent, the Democratic party seeks to remind our countrymen that their government needs no larger misson than is found in the development of the domain which American independence and American growth have made the dwelling place of a free, prosperous and inpay people.

A Return to First Allegiances.

A Return to First Allegiances.

I am hoping that these things will be seriously considered by the young men of our country who are selecting their party affiliations, or who in present political conditions seek by their votes to meet the demands of our best citizenship. I am addressing them as those on whose shoulders will soon rest the responsibility of protecting and preserving American free institutions, and assuming their sincerity and open-mindedness, I am asking them whether, in view of the increasing tendency to light-hearted cardiesness in the administration of public affairs, it is not well to insist upon a return to old indmarks and a renewal of the sentiment among our people that the management of their government is a serious undertaking. To those who believe that efforts in that direction should be made. I have no hesitation in suggesting that within the lines of the Democratic party they will find those efforts organized and in full activity.

What I have said touching the conservatism of the Democratic party under the dominance of its true principles does not by any means give ground for the accusation or justify the suspicion that Democraticy is reactionary or that it is dull in its apprehension of the varying needs of the people. These deficiencies could not possibly exist in a party whose length of life nearly measures the nation's existence, and whose highest claim upon the people's preference has always been its servitude to the people's welfare. It readily recognics new conditions and new necessities, but it believes that these can be most effectively and safety met by adherence to the broad principles in which it finds guidance, and by their honest application in every emergency. It
